If you are looking to sell gold jewellery, the first step is to understand the type of jewellery you have and the factors that may affect its value.

Gold jewellery can include rings, necklaces, bracelets, earrings, pendants and other items. The value may depend on the purity of the gold, its weight and the current gold market price.

If you want to sell my gold jewellery or sell your gold jewellery, it is useful to check for a hallmark or fineness mark. This can help identify the purity of the gold. Common gold purities include 9ct, 14ct, 18ct and 22ct.

The condition of the jewellery may also be relevant. Broken or damaged items can still contain valuable gold. However, jewellery containing diamonds or coloured gemstones may have additional value that should be considered separately.

Before you sell gold jewellery, consider whether the item has any sentimental, antique or collectible value. Not every piece of jewellery should automatically be treated only as scrap gold.

Understanding your jewellery and the factors that may influence its value can help you make a more informed decision.
