If you are thinking, “I want to sell my gold”, understanding the process can help you make a more informed decision. People may decide to sell gold for many reasons, including having unwanted jewellery, old items that are no longer worn or gold that they no longer need.

Before you sell your gold, it is useful to understand what you own. Gold can be found in many forms, including rings, necklaces, bracelets, earrings, coins and bars. The value of an item can depend on factors such as its purity, weight and the current gold market price.

Checking your jewellery for a hallmark or fineness mark can help you understand its gold purity. Common gold purities include 9ct, 14ct, 18ct and 22ct. If you are unsure about the meaning of a hallmark or the purity of an item, a professional assessment can provide further information.

The condition of your gold can also be relevant. Broken or damaged jewellery may still contain valuable gold. However, jewellery containing diamonds or coloured gemstones may have value beyond its gold content.

If you are considering a sale of your gold, it is important to understand the item you are selling and the factors that may affect its value. Taking the time to research your gold before selling can help you make a more informed decision.
