The best way to sell gold jewellery depends on the type of jewellery you own and the factors that may affect its value.

Before selling, check your jewellery for hallmarks or fineness marks. These can help identify the purity of the gold. The weight and current market price of gold may also be important when assessing the item.

It is also worth considering whether the jewellery contains diamonds or other gemstones. Some pieces may have value beyond the gold content because of their gemstones, design, age or collectability.

When searching for the best place to sell your gold jewellery, choose a reputable business and make sure you understand how the assessment process works.

Broken or damaged jewellery may still have value, so do not assume that an item has no value simply because it is no longer wearable.

By understanding your jewellery and considering all the factors that may contribute to its value, you can make a more informed decision about the best way to sell gold jewellery.
